

Does your cell phone give you more or less control over your social life?

Hmm... probably more control, considering that most people are online, now.

I guess you could say less control in that you're always available, theoretically.

You're able to stay in contact with people on a more regular basis, I would say.

A bit of both. I think there's more control because it's easier to coordinate outside of my home. Sort of, if I want to get together with friends, I can text them or I can check my email.

I would say both. I think in some ways more control, because I can check emails and look up things any time I have it with me.

Then again, it also kind of kills your social life, because you're focused on a little mechanical device rather than actual people. And I think actual people are better than a little phone.

I think there's so much you can do on the phone, but you miss interaction with people.
