

Do cell phones make lysing easier?

Make lying easier...

Umm... no. By texting?

I guess, I mean a little bit, right? I guess if you have a cell phone, I guess when I was a kid, when I was like a teenager, you would call from your friend's house and say I'm at my friend's and they could tell from the caller ID, like your parents could tell from the caller ID. With a cell phone, you can call and say I'm at my friend's house, but you could really be at the... Dairy Queen or something.

I don't see how it would be easier to lie.

I don't feel like I use it that way and I don't think that people in my life use it that way.

Oh yeah it takes away the guilt factor completely. You don't have any inhibitions, you can lie your cheeks off.

It's like why would illegally downloading a song on the Internet be any different than stealing a CD from the store? They're both stealing, but one... you know? It's just, the Internet makes things feel a little guiltless.

I don't think so. I can lie just as easily with my old phone through text.

Well, I read a statistic somewhere, I think it was in The Atlantic, that 30% of the people you see on the street either talking or texting on their cell phone are actually talking or texting to nobody and pretending to talk or text, so that sense I think 30% of the people must be lying.